Low-carbon hydrogen economy based on renewable electricity in rural and urban regions. The hydrogen economy is becoming popular in the low-carbon hydrogen industrialization era. However, the existing low-carbon hydrogen industrial chains are significantly dependent on fossil energy. Due to the lack of power, the hydrogen economy cannot be realized in rural and urban regions. On the basis of renewable energy, the hydrogen economy can be more widely implemented in rural and urban regions. In this study, a hydrogen economy model based on renewable energy in rural and urban regions is established by using the hydrogen economy principles and the concepts of macroeconomics and regionalization. The results show that the hydrogen economy can significantly reduce the carbon emission intensity and increase economic benefits. The average value of the output per unit economic benefits is 0.202 times that of the conventional hydrogen economy. This result is 0.6 times that in the high-carbon emission scenario. The average value of the output per unit carbon emission intensity reduction is 0.017 times that in the conventional hydrogen economy. This result is 0.7 times that in the high-carbon emission scenario. Compared with the conventional hydrogen economy, the hydrogen economy based on renewable electricity can effectively reduce the carbon emission and economic benefits in rural and urban regions.
