Six months from the day we arrived in Bolivia, my husband had to return home, leaving me in what can only be described as a true ghost town. By then I had been spending up to six months a year in Bolivia and was very comfortable with the city of La Paz. It was, therefore, a very hard time in my life. Since then, I have tried to come back to Bolivia, even after meeting my husband in New York, and even after I brought home our baby daughter. But there is always something missing. I miss the color of the sky and the rain, the feel of the sun on my face, the delicious hot cup of coffee or tea, and the taste of the coca, a local leaf which has been used for millennia in South America. However, after our daughter was born, I even found myself missing the winds of Lake Titicaca. This is a great lake in South America, the largest lake in South America and one of the largest lakes in the world. In fact, the lake is almost twice the size of the country of Japan! This is a beautiful lake with a depth of up to 2,210 feet. In the winter, the lake freezes completely, making it even more breathtaking. The city of Copacabana has a small sliver of a beach, but one can walk up to the city. The nearest hotel, however, costs hundreds of dollars a night. Therefore, I only took pictures in the city. The inhabitants speak Spanish and Quechua, the native tongue of the people of the Andes. They are a wonderful people, very friendly and hospitable. Nevertheless, they are also a little superstitious and a bit conservative. I can remember seeing a young woman in Copacabana trying to buy some strawberries. A vendor told her that the fruits would have no luck with her if they were not bought with a piece of string. So she bought the strawberries. But then, she wanted to test the luck of the fruit. So she threw the piece of string that she had just used to buy the fruit away from her. The vendor then told her that these strawberries were the same as the strawberries she bought with the string. Nevertheless, I have recently traveled to Bolivia with a visit to Lake Titicaca. I was there in the company of my husband and two children. I have never been to a lake so big and deep before, and it is so beautiful that I did not want 2d92ce491b
