Yield of coronary angiography and revascularization in patients with stable coronary artery disease. Coronary angiography (CA) has a yield in the diagnosis and management of patients with stable coronary artery disease (CAD) that is limited to patients with chest pain of recent onset and/or with a high pretest likelihood of CAD. The purpose of this study was to evaluate the usefulness of CA in patients with stable CAD. We enrolled 166 patients (114 males, 58 females; mean age, 62 +/- 11 years) with stable CAD and normal left ventricular function. Of the 166 patients, 58 had undergone percutaneous transluminal coronary angioplasty (PTCA) and 53 were on optimal medical therapy. All patients had symptom-limited treadmill exercise testing, coronary arteriography, and left ventriculography. CA was performed on an average of 12 +/- 5 months after the initial evaluation. The CA revealed significant CAD in 41 patients (25%). Of the 41 patients with significant CAD, 13 had single-vessel disease, 23 had double-vessel disease, and five had triple-vessel disease. Patients were managed medically (n = 54) or with PTCA (n = 11) according to clinical assessment of need. There were no significant differences in age, sex, symptom duration, or symptom-limited exercise testing results between the 41 patients with significant CAD and the 116 patients without significant CAD. There were no significant differences in ejection fraction, number of diseased coronary vessels, or left ventricular end-systolic and end-diastolic volumes between the 41 patients with significant CAD and the 115 patients without significant CAD. During follow-up for a mean of 2.4 +/- 0.7 years after the initial evaluation, clinical events developed in seven (22%) of the 31 patients with significant CAD and in four (6%) of the 73 patients without significant CAD (P = .02). Thus, CA revealed significant CAD in 25% of the patients with stable CAD and normal left ventricular function. In this patient population, CA was useful to rule out CAD and to select patients who could be managed medically. Imagine your floor laid with
