The recent success of the Italian housing crisis has led to the almost euphoric reporting of a repeat of that situation in the UK. The truth is, the two situations are very different, and if we had any sense we'd be preparing to avoid being caught on the wrong side of the economics (or worse). In Italy, it's a price crash and we're seeing the consequences today. The fallout from the banking and property crash in the UK is yet to emerge. This is a problem, since the UK is still very much a part of that crisis. It's very simple, and relatively easy to understand. The credit crunch, and the global economic downturn that followed, hit the UK economy much more heavily than other countries. Our banks are, on the whole, much weaker than in other countries, and this has made it harder for the government to take control of the situation. At the moment, we are all left to face the consequences of an economic crash that is much deeper than any other. We're not the only country having this issue. But we do have the advantage of having the tools to deal with it that others do not have, and the unique position of being able to buy the UK government's silence. We haven't bought the silence yet, but we will. Our insistence on basic austerity over the past 4 years has reduced the government's ability to help the economy. Why are we doing this? Because we are forced to. The result of an economic crash is a government which has a vested interest in minimising the damage. This means that the damage they do to the economy is magnified. As with Italy, and probably Greece as well, the UK can be the exception to the rule, if we're given a crash course in how to do it. At the moment, the government is still very much in denial that the crash is happening. This is a mistake
