The data could be stored (part of) as a HTML document. So you should download the source code of the webpage and open it in a text editor or with a web browser. What you will get is a string of text, containing the variable part which starts with the variable name and then some valid HTML markup (tags). This part will then contain "data". Probably something like: 1 likes You can then extract the text, after the variable, using a text manipulation function such as strpos. The remaining string will contain the value of the variable. Q: Does Spring automatically generate proxy classes in the Spring project? I'm learning Spring so the question is not about Spring... I'm used to using the built-in proxy generator from Apache in this case and I started wondering whether Spring already has one or some code that implements it in its infrastructure. Or I have to use it manually? A: Spring doesn't have such code, but you can generate them yourself. On the "reflection" side you just need to obtain the proxy class of the Spring object. At that point, Spring will create a proxy if it doesn't already exist. Here are a ba244e880a
