This invention relates to an improved paint applicator for painting stripes on walls, floors or other surfaces having improved transverse applicability. The art of painting vertical surfaces has been accomplished by a variety of methods involving dipping a roller, a special sponge roller or a paint brush into the paint and applying the paint by pressing the paint applicator against the surface to be painted. Once the surface is sufficiently covered with paint, the paint applicator is pressed against the previously painted area to be covered to allow the previously painted area to dry, so that the paint may be subsequently wiped or brushed away from the paint applicator for application to a new area of the surface. In the case of the prior art roller, the paint is spread more transversely than in the case of a brush and, thus, the roller cannot be used to cover a wide area with a narrow stripe of paint. In the case of the prior art sponge roller, it is impractical for a homeowner to dip a sponge roller into an inconveniently situated can of paint and to constantly dip the roller into the paint to thoroughly cover a wider surface with a narrow stripe of paint. In the prior art brush, the surface to be painted is dipped into the paint, which is dragged across the area to be painted by brushing the paint applicator back and forth across the area to be painted. Conventional paint rollers and sponge rollers cause an undesirable splashing of paint, which is difficult and messy to clean up. Brushes, while eliminating the problems associated with the prior art applicators, require excessive time to thoroughly cover a wide area with a narrow stripe of paint. The paint applicator of the present invention can be used with a conventional roller to cover a wide area with a narrow stripe of paint. This paint applicator eliminates the problem of splashing paint and is much easier to clean up. It reduces the time required to completely paint a wide area with a narrow stripe of paint and is less messy. The paint applicator of the present invention can be wiped away from the surface to be painted and will not leave a sticky residue on the surface.
