The .The “Active Shooter Drill” is being added to the annual National Public Safety Memorandum January 31, 2019 By: Jonathan Ismore Only 58 days before the first-ever National Public Safety Memorandum day, the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) is announcing new shooter drills for law enforcement to include in their training programs.

While the drills are known to be controversial, there are many who view them as useless and even harmful in the hands of law enforcement in the face of active shooter situations. Last week, the Homeland Security Advisory System released a National Public Safety Memorandum that focused on specific threats, such as high-risk businesses and critical infrastructure. The memorandum also set forth the directives that resulted from the Interagency Task Force on the Analysis of an Active Shooter. Now, in a document dated January 31, 2019, DHS announced its public awareness campaign that includes planned training events “focused on building awareness about the benefits of active shooter training.” These include a training program developed by the International Association of Chiefs of Police (IACP), “Dismantling the Active Shooter.” The drill involves a scenario similar to an active shooter situation. In an active shooter drill, a shooter is placed in a specific location at the beginning of the scenario. The response team is the one who enters the scene and tries to end the attack, usually by killing the shooter. The drill ends when the response team enters the scene, according to DHS. However, while DHS is adding these events to the nation’s calendar of public awareness campaigns, others view them as simply “active shooter trainings” for law enforcement. “DHS’ intention to provide more funding and tools to law enforcement to stop potential active shooters is welcome, but it’s woefully inadequate to address the rapidly growing problem of frequent mass shootings in the United States,” Bill Aiello, senior public safety fellow at the Cato Institute’s Center for Constitutional Studies
