Computed Tomography and Nuclear Magnetic Resonance Imaging in the Diagnosis and Staging of Peritoneal Metastasis of Ovarian Cancer.

Peritoneal metastasis of ovarian cancer is associated with a poor prognosis, and standard diagnostic methods are lacking. Therefore, the aim of this study was to evaluate the feasibility of computed tomography (CT) and magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) in the diagnosis and staging of peritoneal metastasis of ovarian cancer. In a retrospective study, CT and MRI in the preoperative evaluation of peritoneal metastasis of ovarian cancer (n = 16) were compared to staging by laparoscopy (n = 21) and to histopathological findings (n = 26) in the resected specimen. According to laparoscopy, 19 (86%) of the patients were correctly staged. In four (19%), more lymph nodes were removed than predicted by CT/MRI. In 14 (58%) patients, the number of lymph nodes removed was less than that indicated by CT/MRI. In the surgical specimen, the number of peritoneal metastases was underestimated in four (15%) patients and the resected tumor volume was smaller than predicted in three (13%) patients. There was a trend toward an underestimation of peritoneal disease in patients with ascites (χ^2 test: $P = .092$). CT and MRI are reliable methods in the preoperative evaluation of
