Pharmacology of the sulfhydryl drug, 2,3-dimercapto-1-propanesulfonic acid. 2,3-Dimercapto-1-propanesulfonic acid (DMPS) is one of the best sulfhydryl drugs for increasing glutathione, in both clinical and experimental settings. DMPS has a complex pharmacology in which the sulfhydryl group, thiolate, and dihydroliipoic acid (DHPA) are involved in many of the actions of the drug. The sulfhydryl group is important for enhancing the elimination of toxic xenobiotics and especially for the protective effects of DMPS in experimental models of ischemia, thrombosis, and chemical injury. The release of biogenic amines and/or their formation of toxic metabolites is a primary effect of the sulfhydryl drugs and contributes to the increased susceptibility to other drugs, including alcohol and other xenobiotics. The drug also lowers cellular and plasma levels of glutathione. The actions of the thiolate are dependent upon the concentration of the thiolate. In DMPS, there is a profound inverse relationship between the level of thiolate and the cytotoxic, genotoxic, and/or mutagenic effect of the drug. However, the thiolate is also important for protecting cells from ROS-generated damage. DHPA protects cells from the cytotoxic and genotoxic effects of the thiolate by serving as an antioxidant. Video: Introducing the Dual Chamber Trigger 03.30.2016 The great news for Sharpshooters is that the Dual Chamber Trigger has been released into the wild. Initially previewed at the 2014 SHOT Show, the Dual Chamber Trigger System is a simple and effective device for managing muzzle movement with accuracy. The concept is for the barrel to be the 'hammer' and the solid receiver the 'anvil.' This system allows the shooter to zero the rifle more easily, and shifts muzzle movement toward a repeatable setting. At the time it was not known if this system worked, it was not known if it would work in an AR rifle. We had to see if it was any good in a practical sense. Sharpshooter's long-time friend and sharpshooter, Graham Robinson, has a company called Edelbrock, Inc. Graham developed
