Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an operation state managing device in a gear type transmission.

2. Description of the Related Art Conventional hybrid automobiles have an engine, a first motor/generator, an electric storage system, and a second motor/generator, all of which are housed in a common housing. These devices are connected to an on-vehicle power supply through a power supply control unit. The power supply control unit also controls the supply of electric power to the engine, the first motor/generator, and the second motor/generator by switching a mechanical power transmission system such as a planetary gear set or a clutch between an input shaft of the gear type transmission and the engine. The on-vehicle power supply is loaded with a responsibility to ensure battery durability by stopping the supply of electric power to the engine and the first motor/generator when the ignition is off. To cope with the demand for fuel economy improvement, there has been a demand to improve the fuel economy by decreasing the amount of electric power to be supplied to the engine and the first motor/generator when the ignition is off by managing the operation states of the engine, the first motor/generator, and the second motor/generator by calculating the operation state of the gear type transmission in which the engine, the first motor/generator, and the second motor/generator are accommodated and executing control to switch on and off the first motor
