What's New in the Download Photoshop Actions Pack Free?

Apple appears to have been testing a new tablet design internally for the past year, a new filing on the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office (USPTO) reveals. The patent was first spotted by Chinese blog iLounge and AppleInsider confirmed that a design registered earlier this month was the same one mentioned in the patent. Published last week, Apple's design patent describes a 7.9-inch tablet with a metallic finish and rounded corners and edges. The patent does not provide any details about what model the tablet might end up being, but it provides a table showing changes between what the company has been testing and the final version. One of the main differences between the test model and the tablet Apple actually released is that it appears to feature slightly smaller bezels on the edges compared to the published iPad. The company has designed its tablet with a 16:9 aspect ratio rather than the standard 3:2 aspect ratio and it appears that Apple is testing smaller bezels at the top and bottom in an attempt to have a thinner profile. The second picture shows that the top and bottom bezels have been narrowed, giving the device a more rectangular look. The top bezel appears to be a physical button with what appears to be the Home button with a black ring around it. It's not clear exactly what the button does, but some speculate that it might be used to wake the iPad from sleep. The patent doesn't mention iOS or any other operating system, leaving it unclear exactly what the device could end up running. However, AppleInsider's exclusive report from May indicates that it's possible the tablet could run Google's Android operating system. Apple also filed a patent earlier this year with similar rounded corners and bezels that was originally reported by FOSS Patents. The design concept appeared to be intended to make the tablet easier to hold in your hands. The new design in Apple's patent is closer to the one it released last year, but there are still some notable differences. The iPad in the 2012 design patent is much larger than the one Apple is testing, and appears to be over 9 inches long. Other design patents Apple filed in 2012 showed designs for a 7-inch tablet with a thinner design and a larger bezel. Apple is expected to detail its new tablet at the company's event on Tuesday, September 9th. Apple's revised iPad minis are expected to debut next month alongside the new iPad. iOS
