I am in a dilemma as to why my Web application is throwing a FileAccessDeniedException when opening a file in my IIS / ASP.NET web application. The good news: I do know why the exception is being thrown. I just do not understand why it is still throwing. The bad news: I'm not certain if the only solution will actually resolve the issue. How does a Web Application set the value in web.config for the element? I want to be able to change the settings for the application on the fly, and by changing the value, will change the exceptions being thrown. I am reading this article right now. Changing the value for the application in IIS might fix the issue. However, are there any other things I should be considering? I can't change the web.config of the ASP.NET website itself, right? A: You can't change the settings of other users in the iis settings. You could change the account that IIS runs as, or make a new account with sufficient rights. If you want the setting to be that of a specific user, not the machine itself, you need to set that under the user's account
