* Tools . In this category, you'll find all the basic image manipulation tools: cloning, healing, masking, reworking, and text.

* Batch . Files containing layers are referred to as _batch files_. With this tool, you can process a bunch of them at once.

* Filters . Plug-ins that add special effects to your images. You can install them from the Adobe website.

* Layers . Layers let you edit an image and apply the changes to a second, copyable image.

* Photomerge . This tool allows you to take multiple images and combine them into one seamless image.

* RGB color . Photoshop's default color scheme is the YCC color model, which is the most common and which is what you should assume when you're working with color in Photoshop. But there is another model for RGB color that goes by the same name. Sometimes you'll see it referred to as YCbCr, the way color is understood by the device that displays an image.

* Channel . This tool lets you split the pixels of the red, green, or blue (RGB) components of an image (see the "Adjusting Levels" box on the previous page). In the Layers panel, this feature creates a color channel that you can use to alter any layer, one layer at a time, the way you would with a color adjustment. In other words, you can create a new layer that's Red, then a new layer that's Green, and so on.

* Color . This tool is for picking a color and working with it.

* Composite . This tool allows you to combine images together, layer by layer, just as you can with the Layers panel.

* Faster . This tool makes certain commands and options available when you're working quickly.

* Export . This tool opens a dialog box from which you can choose a file destination. You can save a PSD or a JPEG file, or you can share your image via PDF, SVG, or TXT. Photoshop supports 15 different file format types. You can save your files in any of these formats, and you can open any of them in Photoshop.

Frequency of engagement of care with a mental health provider was examined in a random national sample of 2,921 individuals with any mood and/or anxiety disorder from the National Comorbidity Survey (NCS). Multivariate regression analyses revealed higher rates of provider contact among persons with greater severity of symptoms. After controlling for severity, the highest rates of care were associated with mood and anxiety disorders, substance abuse, and other psychiatric disorders. Rates of care were significantly higher among men than women, among white persons than African Americans, and among persons with full-time jobs than among those not employed. Not only is being treated by a mental health provider associated with increased likelihood of further treatment, but there are some gender and socioeconomic differences. However, the nature of self-reported information raises concerns about the validity of our results, as self-reported information may be influenced by recall bias. Moreover, the low response rate in this survey (4.4%) may have resulted in limited generalizability to the wider population. It is well known that men are more likely to respond to survey questionnaires than women [\[\[@B16\]\]](#). The slight disparities in sex and age distribution between respondents and non-respondents may also limit the representativeness of our sample. Given the cross-sectional nature of this study, we could not assess causality between hepatitis A and injecting. Nevertheless, to the best of our knowledge, our findings are the first to report the association between hepatitis A and KS transmission, and the findings suggest that hepatitis A is playing a significant role in KS transmission.

Conclusions ===== Our study shows that the proportion of individuals infected with hepatitis A virus was higher in the injecting group and not in the non-injecting group. In addition, the prevalence of hepatitis A was the lowest in the age group of 20--24 years in the non-injecting group, while it was highest in the age group of 18--20 years in the injecting group. Therefore, because it is believed that older adults and adults in the 'youth' group are more likely to be infected with hepatitis A virus, as demonstrated in the present study, health policy makers in countries, especially where the prevalence of hepatitis A is high, should consider the vaccination of these populations as part of the strategy to prevent KS transmission. Competing interests ===== The authors declare that they have no competing interests. Authors' contributions ===== HL, K-CS, T-CL and S-CS contributed equally to the study design and manuscript drafting. K-WH and K-CT completed the data collection. All authors read and approved the final manuscript.
